MORE FROM QUESTIONSANSWERED.NET Sensory details appeal to the five senses: sight, sound, smell , touch, taste. When writing a personal narrative, your objective is to get the reader to feel like they are there with you. Adding sensory details will help you achieve this goal. Sight (this is used most often, but trying using all of them!) Dark green of rolling pastures the streets glistened like shiny ornaments after the rain the slivered moon sat in the sky like an old fingernail clipping the flashing blue lights from the police cruiser lit up our dark house Sound The walls shook and vibrated like the tail of a rattle snake Ice crackled and pinged against the family room window like a baseball striking a bat Wind swirled around our beach house whistling loudly to a terrible tune The television buzzed as it shut off, and the furnace sighed one last time before the house fell silent. The cracking of wood splitting punctuated each burst of fire like an exclamation point. the sounds of emergency sirens awakened the still roads wailing like a newborn baby Smell the baking cake filled the kitchen with aroma of vanilla cinnamon-scented candle reminded of the Big Red gum my father chewed the beach air smelled of seaweed and salt the warm summer air smelled of freshly cut grass Touch The heavy quilt felt like an x-ray vest draped across our legs The prickly feathers of the boa stuck my neck The puppy's nose was dry like sandpaper The sand was hot and grainy like my morning grits. Taste Sweet, juicy strawberries Sour lemonade salty chips juicy tartness of orange rancid butter A handout of this resource is available here. Using the 5 senses in writing can deeply immerse readers in scenes and stories. It's a skill that can elevate books to a higher level. But so often we writers find ourselves lured into the trap of relying on sight and sound. Describing how something looks or sounds isn't always enough to bring a story to life. Many people experience things through smells, touch, and taste. It's our job as authors to use the five senses in writing to enrich our tales and prose with vivid imagery, which is often used to help the reader feel immersed and engaged. In fact, the oft-forgotten 5 senses are some of the most powerful forms of description, things that can enrich a story and give it life. As we'll see below, using a sensory description has an incredible ability to connect with us on a psychological level. In this guide, we'll take a look at the five sensory organs, why we use senses in writing, look at a bunch of illustrative 5 senses examples, and ways we can use each one to elevate our stories to the next level. How To Use The 5 Senses In Your Writing If you re-read some of your favourite books there'll no doubt be passages where the writer employs a sight and smell or taste or touch to great effect the five senses. Books that transport us to new worlds and take us on epic adventures. And so often it's the vivid descriptions that draw us in and help us walk amongst the characters. Using your five senses in your writing is an incredibly powerful way to immerse your reader in the tale. The more the reader can understand what it's like to be in your character's shoes at that precise moment, be it fleeing a demon or marching to war, knowing how it feels and smells like, as well as the visual and audio descriptions, can elevate stories to a whole new level. It quite simply makes it more enjoyable to read. From a writing at appropriate moments is something your readers will love. From the perspective of the fantasy writer specifically, using the 5 senses is a terrific way to reveal the details created during your worldbuilding process. This is especially useful when you're trying to convey unique imagery or something that's altogether alien to the reader. It's something I used a lot when writing Pariah's Lament and readers loved it. This is just one of the many 5 senses in a writing context, let's look at what the five sensory organs are: Eyes Ears Special receptors in the skin that enable us to touch and feel Nose Tastebuds Combined, our five senses enable us to learn, experience and create memories. Pepsi Max, for example, always reminds me of my history lessons in college—I'd drink a can during every lesson. Think of songs too. They have an incredible ability to transport us back to moments in our past. Let's explore things in more detail. If you'd like to learn more about the basics surrounding the 5 senses, see more examples, or learn how to incorporate sensory description in your writing, see this quick video. What Are Sensory Details? Sensory details make use of the five senses—touch, sight, taste, sound, and smell—to make your writing more immersive. This draws readers deeper into the story such that they feel like they're experiencing everything is the process of using the senses of sound, sight, touch, taste and smell in our writing to paint vivid images in a reader's mind. Sight Perhaps the main one of the five senses, sight often receives information first and therefore forms our initial judgements. When it comes to using sight in writing, our stories and characters are often guided by this prime form of describe every aspect of a scene, and even if you did achieve it, nigh impossible to read. Some of the most acclaimed writers, Charles Dickens, in particular, approached it by picking the right details. The little things that tell us everything. Let's look at an example of the sense of sight in writing from Great Expectations: "There was a bookcase in the room; I saw, from the backs of the books, that they were about evidence, criminal law, criminal biography, trials, acts of parliament, and such things. The furniture was all very solid and good, like his watch-chain. It had an official look, however, and there was nothing merely ornamental to be seen. In a corner, was a little table of papers with a shaded lamp: so he seemed to bring the office home with him in that respect too, and to wheel it out of an evening and fall to work." This is Jagger's office. Though he doesn't feature, we've gleaned much about who he is from details like the types of books upon the shelves and the paper-filled table, suggesting he lives a busy, professional life. Colour is another fantastic tool when it comes to sight. red for frustration or anger, black for death, white for purity or goodness. Using colour, particularly with themes and the premise, can add extra layers to a story. We explore some more 5 senses examples below to give you some ideas when it comes to sight. Writing Prompt Stand in the middle of your bedroom. Look all around you. Make notes of every little detail you see. Colours, shapes. Crumbs or dust on the floor. The more attentive you can be the better. Pick out things that could relate to characterisation. The books are they? Are there empty glasses beside your bed, dishes too? All of this helps to build interesting imagery, as well as contribute to other elements of the story, in this instance, characterization. Sound Sound is incredibly important when it comes to using the 5 senses in our writing. Dialogue dominates many stories, but so often little attention is paid to how characters sound when they talk. It's strange when you think about how unique people sound, and a person's voice makes such a difference to how we form views of them. Something I learned not so long ago is that ducks don't quack. They tend to grunt or even cackle. It's easy to assume how things sound, but sometimes what we assume is wrong. It's always worth taking the time to research. In doing so you may find new and original ways to describe the sound. Using metaphors and similes, particularly if the sound is unusual, is a great way to bring clarity to descriptions. Another often overlooked thing is silence. Silence is an excellent tool to set the tone or build an atmosphere or tension. A noiseless forest. A still, foggy street. Eerie. Writing Prompt Either using yourself or ideally, your character, place yourself in a location in which things are happening around you—a park, for instance. Close your eyes and listen. Make a note of every little sound you hear, from tweeting birds to jackhammers digging up roads. If you can, make a note of how different sounds make you feel. Do fireworks startle you, for instance? Then think about why they could startle you or your character. Touch Of all the five senses, touch is, in my view, one of the most powerful yet underrated ones. If you can convey touch in an effective way, you'll reap the rewards. The softness of moss between your toes, the cool slime of mud, the pokes and scratches of sticks and stones. Such details can draw readers deeper into the story. We'll look at some sensory writing exercises below, but as a brief writing prompt now, close your eyes and pick something up. Describe how that object feels. What features does it have? The texture? Sturdiness? Width? Weight? These little details can make all the difference when it comes to incorporating the 5 senses in your writing. Taste Taste is the more neglected one out of the five sensory organs when it comes, using taste can enrich your story immensely. How many times have you said the phrase, "It tastes like ...". So many of our memories are tied to tastes. Like I said before, Pepsi Max always reminds me of history classes in college. Which tastes trigger memories for you? If this happens to us, it happens to us, it happens to your characterization process. Like smell, taste can serve as a trigger for memories. For example, a husband who shared a love for apple turnovers baked by his deceased wife is reminded of her whenever he eats one. Taste can also trigger emotions. There've been times when I've eaten food that tasted so good I bounced with glee in my chair. Writing Prompt A fun one. Head down to your kitchen and finding something to eat that has a bit of texture. Close your eyes, take a bite. Focus closely as you chew, as the food rolls around your mouth, over your tongue and down your throat. How does it taste? How does it taste? How does it taste? How does it make you feel? Smell We, at last, arrive at smell, though its place is no reflection on its importance when it comes to using the 5 senses in our writing. The power of smells cannot be underestimated. We smell things all of the time and those scents help to shape our impressions. What can you whiff right now? A smell helps us to form a judgement on things, such as whether something's okay to eat. And crucially, smells can trigger vivid memories and emotions, vital tools to any writer. Here's an example of using the sense of smell in writing from James Joyce's Ulysses of how smells (and tastes) can enrich prose. It truly is one of the great examples of the 5 senses in writing. "Mr Leopold Bloom ate with relish the inner organs of beasts and fowls. He liked grilled mutton kidneys which gave to his palate a fine tang of faintly scented urine." Writing Prompt Similar to the task above which involves a trip out to a busy place, like a park, sit down and have a good sniff. Another good place to try is a coffee shop. Lots of smells lead you in your mind. Do they trigger memories? Do associated words pop into your mind? From your character's perspective, this is what their experience would be like too. How do you describe the smell of rain in creative writing? The technical term for the smell of rain is "petrichor". Rain brings with it a freshness, a crispness, an earthiness. It awakens the scents of other things like dry soil, flowers and grass. Are There More Than 5 Senses? Now, something you may be wondering about is whether or not there is more than touch, taste, sound, sight, smell. These golden 5 were defined by Aristotle because he could relate them to sensory organs. They are sometimes known as the "five senses folk model". But it depends on the manner in which you define a sense. Newer approaches look at the number of sensory organs we have. And many academics now counter the sixth sense as the vestibular system. This relates to the inner ear and the impact it has on our balance and vision. But other academics have gone further than this. Some tweak the definition to include sensory receptors, relating to pain, temperature, touch and body awareness (otherwise known as proprioception). So when someone asks how many senses do we have, it's all a matter of definition. 5 Senses Examples It's always useful to reinforce something freshly learned with some examples. As we've seen above, vivid imagery is often used to help the reader feel immersed in the story. So in this section, I've provided some descriptive writing examples from some bestselling books that make great use of the 5 senses. "The tearing of flesh, as though a butcher were yanking meat from a flank. The bubbling of liquids and the soft rasping of the cutting tools." Tooth & Nail, Ian Rankin "Stars spun across his vision and his head felt as if it were about to burst... With difficulty, Hanno undid the chinstrap and eased off his helmet. Cool air ruffled his sweat-soaked hair." Hannibal: Fields of Blood Ben Kane "A cold wind was blowing out of the north, and it made the trees rustle like living things. All day, Will had felt as though something were watching him, something cold and implacable that loved him not." A Game of Thrones, George RR Martin "It was dark and dim all day. From the sunless dawn until evening the heavy shadow had deepened, and all hearts in the City were oppressed. Far above a great cloud streamed slowly westward from the Black Land, devouring light, borne upon a wind of war; but below the air was still and breathless, as if all the Value of Anduin waited for the onset of a ruinous storm." The Return Of The King, JRR Tolkien. This last one for me is a great example of a descriptive paragraph using the five senses. If you'd like to find more sensory description examples, I recommend doing this simple exercise: Pick up any book that you don't mind marking with a pen or highlighter. Next, scan the pages, looking for descriptive scenes. Whenever you see a sentence that refers to any of the five senses, highlight it in some way. The benefit of doing this is that you get examples from a variety of different writers, each with their own clever way of making their exposition more 5 senses examples for your writing, one of the best thing you can do is to read books that pay particular attention to this. One of the standout books that explore this is Blindness by José Saramago. There's no shortage of sensory detail examples out there for you to study. From books to writing guides like this, there are plenty of helpful resources you can learn from. 5 Senses Writing Checklist Something I've done to improve my use of the 5 senses in my writing is to include them within the planning process. It's good to save it until the end when you've plotted out your story or chapter, however. What I do is read over the plan and try and place myself in the scenes. Working my way through each sense, I list everything that pops into my head. It'll be unlikely that you need to spend too much time on sight, but taking the time to consider things in detail can provoke new and unique ideas. What little details can be included? Remember the power of specificity. Next, onto sounds. Like sights, it's unlikely you'll need to spend too much time on this but it's always helpful to consider the likes of characters' voices and any usual sounds that could be featured. Smells. When it comes to smells a good starting point is to list everything that comes to mind, even mere whiffs, which can be the most telling of all. Smells can provoke memories and emotions too, like the smell of perfume could remind a character of their dead lover, and that leaves you open to describe emotions. What can your character touch or feel? How does the hilt of the sword feel in your character? What information can be gleaned from the manner of a handshake? Lastly, what tastes, if any, can you include? Is your character eating? Can they taste blood after being punched in the cheek? Do they enter a room where the smell is so foetid they can taste it? Descriptive Writing Using The Senses One way to achieve effective descriptive writing is to include sensory details. This creates a clear picture in the reader's mind. We can do this by appealing to the reader's senses of hearing, sight, smell, touch and taste, as well as feelings. Examples Of A Descriptive Paragraph Using The Five Senses Nothing is better for reinforcing knowledge than by looking at examples. Creative writing exercises can really help too, and we'll look at some of those in the section below. I wanted to provide you with a few sensory details examples here that bring together the different senses. Examine how they elevate the scene by drawing you deeper. Each little detail paints a more vivid picture, such that you can almost feel yourself. This is a real skill when it comes to creative writing, but it's definitely one you can learn and master. Example 1 The mud of the road sucked at her tattered leather boots, a quagmire after incessant rains. Autumn circled like a hawk. The wind grabbed at her woollen green cloak and homespun dress. The hand-me-downs from her cousins never fitted, always too wide at the waist and short of length. Example 2 way the biting chill. Example 2 way the biting chill. The ringing gave way to those crashes and bangs, each one coming with the beat of his heart. His eyes flickered open. Slate-grey clouds hung above. Dust hovered down upon him. He raised his throbbing head and looked around. Men and women, hands over their ears, cowered down behind the crenellations of the wall, fear etched upon their faces, consuming their eyes, paralyzing their bodies. A few defiant individuals continued to loose arrows. For many, it was the last they shot. The Karraban thunder smashed the parapets to bits, obliterated siege engines, battered the cliff behind them and knocked from it great chunks of rock that tumbled down to crush those below. The ringing in Jem's ears eased enough for him to hear the screams. They became the backdrop to the rumbling of the Karraban thunder. Only one thought entered Jem's mind: flee. Example 3 The bells rang loud and panicked across Yurrisa. Hidden in the shadows of the abandoned warehouse, Edvar and the others lay in wait. He peered through a crack in a boarded window at the cobbled street. Echoing along it came a shout. Another. Steps rushed toward him, and into view burst a group of soldiers, breaths billowing mist in the cold morning air. Example 4 Laughter rippled from the table behind Edvar. The three men were tanners, the least difficult of all working men to identify: stained clothes and hands and stinking of a peculiar cocktail of rotten flesh and mint. They rubbed themselves with the latter to mask the stench of the former. Nobody could bear their presence long enough to tell them it didn't work. As you can see, each example uses each of the five senses to great effect. If you're curious where these came from, I pinched them from Pariah's Lament. Please share your own 5 senses examples in the comments below. We've covered a lot about using sensory descriptions and how they can elevate your writing to the next level. However, there are a lot of scientific studies that back up the theory. For instance, in a study published back in 2011 by Theorem Quarterly Journal of Experimental Psychology, it was found that we process certain words faster than others if there is a sensory experience attached to them. Such studies aren't new. In fact, Miller and Johnson-Laird (1976) examined how fundamental "word-percept associations" are to our language. This was expanded upon n a 2003 study by Rakova who emphasised a very important point—that the purpose of language is to express how we feel, what we see, hear, smell and taste. Another study on sensory linguistics (which looks at how we interact with the world through feeling, seeing, tasting, hearing and smelling. What we can see here is a growing understanding of the power and influence of a piece of sensory description. By examining these studies, writers can find a whole new appreciation for using the 5 senses in writing. Using The 5 Senses In Writing - Exercises Here are a few useful exercises to get into the swing of using the senses. The more you practice, the more it'll become ingrained in the way you write. The touch of the rain or breeze, how the pavement feels underfoot, snippets of passing conversation you hear, the whistle of birds, how that warm and crispy sausage roll tastes. Warning You may look odd stopping all the time. Close your eyes and pick something up. This one was mentioned above, but it's a powerful tool. Jot down everything you can think of. Pick your favourite food and eat! This one's a bit more fun. Take chocolate for example. Savour each bite and write down everything, from taste to texture, the sounds of it breaking in your mouth, and importantly, how it makes you feel.
